Polynesian Cultural Center □ September 12, 1980

Roger Chickering, well-protected in an "agitator suit," holds off Max's aggressive moves as our three other guard dogs and their masters look on. Our German Shepherds recently completed an intensive six-week obedience training course which prepared them for night patrol duty at PCC. See page 2 for more photos of the training sessions.

PCC's pooches now on patrol

Congratulations to Laie's latest graduating class! PCC's four guard dogs recently completed a rigorous six-week training program and have been accompanying security officers on night duty at the Center since Sunday.

The four German shepherds -- Max, Duke, Tiny and Jaws -- were trained by Rick Ashton of our Security Department. Rick, a retired Air Force officer, had extensive experience working with guard dogs while in the service.

Each dog has been teamed up with a security officer -- his "master." Bart Chickering, chief of Security, says the number of burglaries and after-hour trespassers at PCC should significantly decrease

Canine patrol aids PCC's night security

now that the dogs are active members of the night security squads.

"Animals naturally have a keener sense of vision and smell than man," Bart said. "The training has taught them to respond obediently to their masters' commands. On night duty, we're continuing that basic obedience training by teaching them how to use their senses to detect trespassers in the villages after dark. I have no doubt that the dogs are going to be great assets to our night security patrol."
